Local software development studio Nona made a name for itself in the emerging tech space as one of the first South African companies to complete an equity deal in crypto. This show of faith set them apart in terms of blockchain adoption. They've since gone on to become passionate advocates and leaders in the space and have, subsequently, put their coins where their mouths are. Nona is becoming increasingly well known for leading blockchain workshops, the next of which is an immersion into blockchain tech for investors, innovators and entrepreneurs.

It's therefore not surprising that a UK-based innovation and venture practice aimed at emerging technologies, Redsand Labs (a division of Redsand Partners), took an interest - and have since partnered with Nona to bring a collective blockchain consultancy, smart contract development and emerging tech offering to the global stage. Redsand founder and managing director Nicole Anderson made the following statement: "We look forward to seeing what this partnership will help us achieve in terms of knowledge-sharing around the power of the blockchain and equipping technologists and business people to realise opportunities in this new era."

Mike Scott, CEO of Nona, adds, "As do we. We are collectively technologists and consultants, obsessed with the potential of blockchains and particularly the ways in which smart contracts can change how every industry operates. We're working on our own blockchain projects in a bid to be at the frontier of the new web—Web 3.0. And want to share what we've learned to help investors, innovators and business owners gain a greater understanding of what this technology entails, how it can benefit them and the inner workings behind it. With Redsand Labs as our partner, we are closer to achieving this, both locally and abroad.”

It should be interesting to see how this partnership helps entrepreneurs realise new business opportunities in SA.
