

Filmmakers describe "great honour" of NYC Awards' win

At a time when Africa is facing an unprecedented onslaught against environmental conservation, films like Birth of a Pride are critical to raising awareness of the fragile ecosystems in Africa and elsewhere on the planet.

Wildlife and conservation filmmakers, Beverly and Derek Joubert.

The film is about the extraordinary journey of lions returning to a reserve in Botswana as they grow from a single female and her cub into a fully formed, majestic hunting pride.

"It is a great honour to be recognised with three awards at the New York Cinematography Awards," said Dereck Joubert, founder and CEO of Great Plains Conservation. "We are excited to be able to share our passion for filming and love for wildlife with the world. This film brings international recognition to our country by showcasing Botswana internationally and contributing positively to tourism," said Joubert.

Dereck and Beverly Joubert are ardent ambassadors for Botswana and through the award-winning photography and cinematography, are showcasing the beauty of the country. "It is becoming increasingly evident that we are so close to breaking point on all the environmental issues facing our planet, so it is an excellent time for the film to be recognised. It is vitally important to get this issue recognised by a global audience" said Beverly Joubert, reflecting on this most recent win.

Their company, Wildlife Films, focuses on conservation and has produced over 40 wildlife films. They have received; eight Emmy Awards, one Peabody, two Wildscreen Panda's and an Outstanding Achievement Award at Jackson Hole Wildlife Film Festival.
