

Eskom CEO resists calls to resign amid severe outages

By Alexander Winning

10 Nov 2021

Chief executive of Eskom Andre de Ruyter has resisted calls to resign from miners' union NUM and metalworkers' union Numsa, as well as the Black Business Council on Tuesday, 9 November, amid severe electricity cuts across the country. They called for De Ruyter to either step down or be fired as Eskom ramped up outages in response to multiple faults at its coal-fired generation fleet.

Andre de Ruyter, chief executive of Eskom. Reuters/Sumaya Hsham

De Ruyter took charge of state-owned Eskom in January 2020 and has won plaudits for a long-term plan to transition away from coal and towards cleaner energy sources, but under his watch a maintenance programme has failed to lift power availability as hoped.

"I understand that there are frustrations that we are not achieving our objectives as quickly as we would like to, but these frustrations will not be resolved ... by changing horses at this point in time," De Ruyter told a news conference, saying continuity of management was important.

Eskom's current leadership partly blames repeated breakdowns at its coal units on a decision by previous management to defer crucial mid-life repairs.

South Africa's power grid is under pressure: the how and the why

MJ (Thinus) Booysen and Arnold Rix 3 Nov 2021

De Ruyter said Eskom planned to reduce the current Stage 3 scheduled power cuts to Stage 2 on Friday before suspending the outages on Saturday, as some generation units are due to come back online.

Stage 4 outages require 4,000MW to be shed from the national grid, versus Eskom's total nominal capacity of around 46,000MW. On Monday, more than 20,000MW of Eskom's capacity was offline either because of breakdowns or maintenance work.

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>